What You Need to Know About Your Disease

Jaw joint disorders include several diseases related to the area for a variety of reasons. After obtaining information about the health problems and oral diseases in the examination, the diagnosis is tried to be established with a detailed evaluation including the muscles of the mouth, jaw joint, chewing and head and neck.

Additional investigations may be required at the beginning and during the treatment, and as control aimed in order to examine the masticatory system in detail and to aid diagnosis.

The treatment of jaw joint disorders is similar to that of orthopaedic and rheumatic diseases depending on the diagnosis. The primary purpose of the treatment is to ensure that the jaw functions can be performed normally. In order to achieve this result, orthopaedic equipment (splint) and physical therapy methods which are called conservative treatment and additionally botox injections are used. If these treatment methods are inadequate, surgical approaches such as arthrocentesis and jaw joint surgery may also be used.
